Sungkai Wood

Sungkai wood comes from the Sungkai tree, scientifically known as Peronema canescens Jack. It is characterized by a yellowish-white base color with grain patterns similar to genuine teak wood. It has a medium density, though it is considered a hardwood with a slightly rough texture to the touch. Sungkai wood is commonly used as a raw material for minimalist furniture that highlights its wood grain.

Teak Wood

Teak wood, renowned for its golden to medium brown color that deepens over time, features a predominantly straight grain, sometimes wavy or interlocked. It has a coarse texture with a naturally oily surface, providing a smooth finish, and medium to large pores that enhance its distinct look. Exceptionally durable, teak wood resists decay, water, and pests, making it an excellent choice for both indoor and outdoor furniture. Additionally, its moderate hardness and oily nature make it easy to work with, minimizing the risk of splitting and cracking during furniture production.

Durability

Teak wood is renowned for its exceptional durability, making it one of the most sought-after materials for high-quality furniture. It naturally contains oils and silica, which give it a remarkable resistance to water, decay, and pests, including termites. This inherent durability allows teak wood to withstand harsh environmental conditions, making it ideal for outdoor furniture that can endure sun, rain, and humidity without losing its strength or beauty. Additionally, teak wood is less prone to warping, cracking, or splitting, ensuring that furniture made from it remains sturdy and long-lasting over time.

Rattan weaving

A skilled craftsman meticulously weaves strands of rattan into the frame of a chair, transforming natural materials into functional art. With practiced hands, they interlace the rattan in intricate patterns, ensuring both durability and aesthetic appeal. Each movement reflects precision, patience, and a deep understanding of the craft, creating a timeless piece that harmonizes traditional techniques with contemporary design.

Recycled teak wood is a sustainable and eco-friendly material sourced from reclaimed structures such as old houses, boats, and barns. Known for its durability, strength, and rich character, recycled teak has a unique weathered appearance, often featuring natural imperfections, nail holes, and patina that add to its charm.

By repurposing old teak, this process reduces deforestation and promotes environmental conservation while preserving the natural beauty and high oil content that makes teak highly resistant to moisture, pests, and decay.
